

About the show: “Home For The Holidays”

Type of comedy: Situation Comedy

Plot: Alison and Danny are a young couple, very much in love and living together in NYC. As the Christmas holiday approaches, Alison tries to deal with her parents, inasmuch as they are from the South and very conservative, and don't know that she and Danny live together. And they also don't know that Danny is Jewish. She finally decides to cancel her Christmas trip back home, pleading a busy work schedule, so that she and Danny can enjoy a quiet, romantic holiday together. About the only thing that could go wrong would be if her parents decided to hop on a plane and pay her a surprise visit...

Situations: The only aspect of this show that might be iffy for some is the fact that the young couple, who are fully committed and very much in love, are living together before they are married.

Language: There is no offensive language in this show.

We think this play is suitable for: All audiences. However, it's a love story and young children may not appreciate it. A love story about young people, their parents, and even the elderly. And it all revolves around the Christmas holiday. What could be nicer?

We think you should avoid this play if: The fact that the young couple are not yet married, yet are living together will bother you.

If this were a movie, it would be rated: G
